I have the pleasure to receive of your flattering resultion, and I again place my services at your disposal.
It is gratifying to me to find that my past parliamentary career has met with your approval.

It shall be my duty now to visit, in person, and then take the opportunity of explaining my views on the leading questions of the day, and of ascertaining the wants and wishes of the constituents.

I have the honour to be, Gentlemen,
Your obedient servant,
GEORGE W. LORD

a life to soothe and alleviate the afflictions to which flesh is heir?

The Sisters of Charity have, in this colony, fulfilled their appointed task. We have heard of the hospital of St. Vincent, not from Roman Catholics, but from Protestants, that the patients have been attended with unwearied sympathy and kindness—that the place is a pattern of neatness, and of that regularity and quiet, such as female influence only can secure in a sick chamber. We have been told, too, by ministers, not at all disposed to sympathise with Roman Catholicism, that they have been received, not only with courtesy, but with that cordiality which the nature of the institution and the profession of its founders would seem to promise. We have sometimes inserted and sometimes rejected reports of farming as to the insidious offers of religious toleration within the precincts of a Roman Catholic hospital. The facts, however, were all in favour of that institution, and we have never before heard any complaint of deviation from its professed impartiality.

The case now brought before the public by the Roman Catholics themselves has, therefore, startled the community. We have no quarrel whatever with the Roman Catholic clergyman on account of his opposition to the Protestant Bible and Prayer Book, or any other forms of Protestantism. His objections may be as conscientious and insuperable as many on the Protestant side to works emanating from his own ecclesiastical authorities. If an hospital, the management of which is a strictly Catholic administration to the exclusion of all religious indulgence to other creeds, we should have no reason to complain. Men must pursue their own work in their own way. There is an intolerance of toleration which is even more offensive than bigotry itself. We see no reason why any denomination or individual should break into the religious institutions of their neighbours, or invade their churches any more than they should claim the same privilege with respect to their houses.

But, then, the institution itself offered this impartiality. It was the basis upon which it was founded. It was so recommended by Catholic gentlemen of high reputation. Subscriptions came from all quarters, and men contributed for its support. The committee admitted books such as are now put under the ban. Everything, it appears, has been done for the purpose of conciliating that confidence upon which the institution claimed the general support. We now find, according to the statements made, that this understanding has been violated—that the Protestant books have been removed, and the whole character of the institution changed.

The gentlemen who have interfered owed this interference to their fellow citizens and to themselves. There can be no reason why they should not establish an hospital from which they themselves shall exclude all who are in harmony with the Roman Catholic system. There are many Protestants who would feel no objection to render their support. But, as Mr. PLYMOUTH truly said, the institution ought not to sail under false colours, and if it has been founded in a mistake, with respect to Catholic discipline, or if its practical management is to undergo a change, then that fact ought to be announced, and the institution estimated accordingly.

The tribute paid by her co-religionists to the lady who has just left the colony will, no doubt, meet with general response. We hear, on every hand, testimonies to her amiable character and noble benevolence. We are not disposed to go as strongly realising the ideal of some of those characters of the Middle Ages delineated in the writings of Scott. In truth the principles of benevolence and piety are immortal: society may alter its phases, and they may stand in combination with new systems, but they have never left, and will never disappear from the earth. We are not the less strongly attached to the distinguishing principles of Protestantism, because we cherish towards these virtues a feeling of the highest veneration, whether in a FAY, a NIGHTINGALE, or a DE LACY.

FROM the multiplicity of topics on which candidates have to address to constituencies, it frequently happens that they find themselves obliged to say something on matters on which they are not very well informed, and on which, rather than appear ignorant, they say what is most likely to prove popular, and draw pretty largely on the credulity of their audience, in the hope of escaping censure. Thus, the other day, Mr. B. (who was referring to the city sewerage department), told his hearers, listening to the Government ought to take pattern by the mother country, where the drainage of the metropolis had been taken up as an imperial question—a statement that we read was received with loud cheers. Perhaps the cheers would have been a little less vigorous if Mr. BLACK had known what he was talking about, or if any of his hearers had been sufficiently well informed to have corrected him. Unfortunately for this allusion to imperial practice, the case of the city of London is dead against the claim made by the citizens of Sydney. The Imperial Government not only has not done what Mr. B. asserts, but has not even been asked to do it, in spite of the powerful solicitations to the contrary. Both the Executive Government and the Parliament declined to saddle the general revenue with the cost of what was considered a purely local work. Nay, there was even some special hardship in the case, for the citizens were forced to adopt a more costly design than they wished to do. The Metropolitan Board of Works, which is the representative body elected by the metropolitan residents, wished to carry the drainage only just beyond the present metropolitan limits. But the Government compelled them to carry it some miles further, and would not even consent to bear or share the extra expense of this additional work. It is the high cost in the case that the Executive Government has compelled the Corporation to carry all the sewerage down to Darling Point, and discharge it into the harbour there instead of at Fort Macquarie. The only help which the Government has consented to give the Londoners is, that it will guarantee the debt, and take the security of the metropolitan revenues, by which means the loan has been secured on easier terms than could otherwise have been the case. But this is precisely what our colonial Government has done for the city of Sydney. The cost of the London sewerage will be something that will make our local city-debt look foolish in comparison. It is estimated that three millions sterling to begin with, and most people would have looked into the system to learn to think that it would be at least double that amount before the job is finished.

Again, it is not unfrequently urged by some candidates that the city ought to be put on the same footing with the country municipalities, and endowed in proportion to its revenue; and that if it were, instead of getting a paltry ten thousand a year, it would have something like forty thousand a year from the general revenue, which would be a respectable contribution. But the all-important fact is kept in the background—that the endowments of the country municipalities are not to be permanent, but to last only for a few years; gradually diminishing, till they die away altogether. We incline to think that permanent legislation would provide that all municipalities, whether towns or villages, should be treated alike, and receive an equal share of the favour, so as to prevent all charges of favouritism. But is this what is meant when an endowment of forty thousand a year is talked of? The Municipalities Act of last session provides that for the first five years each municipality shall be endowed to an extent not exceeding the produce of its rates and assessments, (not its income from all sources, be it observed, but only its income from rates and assessments,) for the second five years to an amount not exceeding one-half of this income, and for the third five years to an amount not exceeding one-fourth of this income, and there must there is to be no more endowment at all. So that in fifteen years it will cease altogether. Are the citizens prepared to accept this sort of endowment as a permanent settlement of all their claims? Hitherto they have had ten thousand a year which, though subject to an annual vote, may be regarded as a tolerably permanent provision. Are they ready to commute this for an endowment terminable in fifteen years as above described, and greater than what they at present receive during only the first ten years of that period? Will they prefer to revel in the enjoyment of plenty of money for a few years, and then to be precluded for ever after, or to retain their present modest but steady allowance? Because if the citizens do not wish for a large, and do not really think that on the whole it would be gainers by it, there is some delusion in representing that they receive but scant courtesy from the Government as compared with the rising country municipalities.

Again, we have seen the South Australian land system referred to as more liberal than our own, and as worthy of being looked to as a model, the authors of the comparison being apparently quite unaware that the two systems are identical, being provided for in common by the same imperial Act. That the results have been different in the two colonies—that in New South Wales the land enough has not been grown to supply the wants of the resident population, while in South Australia twice as much as is needed for domestic consumption, has been owing to several causes—partly to the different character of the two populations, partly to the different degree of vigour with which the land system has been worked, and partly, perhaps chiefly, to the different geographical features of the two colonies. In all directions around the city of Adelaide the soil is fertile, and from the foundation of the colony has been put under the plough. The farms that are taken up are all within reach of the port, or of some outport, and the foreign as well as the local market is accessible to the producer. The County of Cumberland is in many places still in a state of nature—timbered as it was when Captain PHILLIP first cast anchor in Botany Bay. The land has been alienated to private owners for many years, and has passed from hand to hand, and yet has still remained untillied, because the soil and climate are unfavourable to the growth of cereals. To this day the traveller may get into a railway carriage at Sydney, and travel to Liverpool, and hardly catch sight of a patch of ploughed land for which he would miss the wants of the soil, and the foreign as well as the local market is accessible to the producer. good object can be obtained by attempting to a policy on incorrect data. We have read somewhere of an enthusiastic Frenchman who a theory, and who, on being shown that the facts were all clean against him, replied, with a sublime disdala of such an argument,—"So much the worse for the facts." We do not imagine that those who are now aspiring to lead and represent public opinion are so indifferent to truth. They are contending, not for barren victory, but for what they consider the public weal, and that weal can never be advanced by manufacturing facts or perverting the lessons of experience.
